Description:

From School Library Journal Gr 3-6-Ten-year-old Boyd Linney is a bounty hunter, primarily focused on bringing righteous law and consequences to his various family members gone wrong. His hobbyhorse morphs into a double-barreled shotgun when needed, and Boyd demonstrates an unforgiving will that begins as satirical but changing into something grimmer and unresolved. Five short interstitial stories appear between chapters of Boyd's ongoing story, and these are truly comic, brief sketches with unambiguous punch lines. Eliopoulos's art is slightly less clean than his work in the "Franklin Richards: Son of a Genius" (Marvel) series, but it suits the excellent color and design work he's done to make the book feel scruffy, textured, and temporally appropriate. The spare, essentialist facial cartooning is still able to convey subtlety of emotion, but the linework and loose layouts fully support any sense of dramatic tension in the enjoyably ludicrous action sequences. The closing chapter in which Boyd is able to stop being so serious and relate to his grandfather like an ordinary kid is the most successful, but it also highlights the strange morality at the heart of the narrative.-Benjamin Russell, Belmont High School, NH(c) Copyright 2011. About the Author Nate Cosby is a former editor at Marvel Comics and worked on Oz, Spider-Man, X-Men: First Class and Spider-Man Loves Mary Jane. He is currently cowriting a book called Pigs with Ben McCool.

Chris Eliopoulos started working in comics two weeks after he began his internship at Marvel. He began freelancing production work until he was hired on staff and worked all the way up to senior letterer before going freelance. He's lettered more books than he can even remember for Marvel, DC, Image and many other publishers and along the way wrote and drew Franklin Richards: Son of a Genius and wrote Lockjaw & The Pet Avengers for Marvel. Eliopoulos lives in New Jersey with his wife and twin boys.
